Stacy Horn challenges her Biomedical Innovations students with a community outreach project every quarter of the school year. This quarter, students were tasked with cleaning out their closets with a purpose of filling seven boxes full of games, puzzles, books, etc., that would help other BCSC students fight cabin fever. Her students went above and beyond, doubling their goal by filling 14 boxes that will be distributed by the school buses providing meals to students in need. Pictured above, North senior Zoey Horn practiced social distancing while picking up a box of goodies from classmate and fellow senior Hannah McKenna.

When students sign up for Principals of Biomedical Science, they know they are going to get their hands dirty with dissections. North freshman Lillian Wells did not let the coronavirus stop her from having such an experience. Lilly shared this message and pictures with her PLTW Biomed instructor Jennifer Steinwedel: "Missing your heart dissection/examination! This is our Easter turkey's heart :)"

A Deeper Connection

There is no doubt our students are experiencing challenges they have never experienced before. For that matter, so are our teachers. However, what has become more and more evident is the deep connection our C⁴ teachers have with their students. PLTW Medical Interventions teacher Carol Behling was honored when East junior Sam Mathews cared enough to send her a picture of his recently birthed kids. Carol explained that she and Sam had just connected for their daily face-to-face Google Hangout when he was informed that his goat had just had her kids. Sam has been talking about the goats for several weeks and was excited about their arrival. He quickly hung up, then sent her this picture right after. This is just one example of how our students and teachers are sharing life together during this time apart.
